Quest of Dungeons was made at C ++ and OpenGL, runs on Windows, Mac and Linux in native code. IOS is not a problem as it only has a thin layer of Objective-C to access some functionalities such as touch, accelerometer, etc. and the rest of the code simply run. I have never done anything for Android, in fact I have never used one before this, so when I decided to carry qod, it had no idea what to expect. In 2010 I researched a bit and the NDK was quite bad, I think I did not even have STL at that time, but things have changed since then. I decided to throw myself and try to carry the whole thing. As a main objective, I want to keep as much native code as possible, because it is already functioning, carrying it to java only could lead to more errors in the process. Tools after researching a little I found that Visual Studio can be used to encode for Android (oh happy day). Visual Studio 2010: vs-Android: Android Ndk, Review 10: Android SDK: ANT-1.9.4: <http://ant.apache.org/bindownload.cgi> jdk 1.8.0: Dependencies My next concern were some dependencies that I have in the Other versions: Openanal Å ¢ for access to the Vorbis sound card Å ¢ for the load / pause of Ogg Freetype 2 Å ¢ For the TTF load tinyxml Å ¢ XML PARSER Fortunately, all of these were possible to compile to Android. Application as an entry point use android_native_app_glue that comes with the NDK, in this way you can omit all java (I have 0 Java Code lines in the game) Another important thing is this line, which tells our file of manifest We do not have Java code
